ANGLICAN WORTHIES

363. Baring-Gould, Sabine (1834-1924)

Priest

Baring-Gould's father's original surname was simply "Baring," a "lord of the manner" of the town of Lew Trenchard in Exeter; "Gould" was added by royal license in 1795 in accordance with his father's inheritance and position in the parish. "Sabine" came from his mother's side. There was wealth in the family. The child was privately tutored, supplemented by trips to the continent. He was eventually sent to preparatory school before matriculating to Clare College. His career was troubled by a bronchial disorder, which he apparently never threw off.

During his first year at Cambridge he announced that he intended to be a priest. After earning an M.A., he taught a few years before taking holy orders. In 1864. At Harbury Bride, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, where he was only a curate, he met Grace Taylor, the daughter of a common mill hand. He was thirty years old; she was only fourteen. It looked like a completely unsuitable relationship, especially with regard to the vast difference in age. It is not clear whether she was formally educated, whereas Baring-Gould was a Fellow of Cambridge, a priest, and heir to a vast fortune. John Sharp, the vicar of the parish, apparently did not think the problem was irremedial and arranged for Miss Taylor to live with relations in the area for two years to learn social manners, to learn how to head up the household of one of the leading figures of a parish community.

He and Miss Taylor were married in 1868. At this time Baring-Gould was curate at Thirsk, a town in Yorkshire now known because of the memoirs of the veterinarian James Heriot, starting with All Creatures Great and Small. What his homespun wife may have lacked in social experience and culture she made up in fecundity, bearing her husband fifteen children, all but one reaching maturity. She died in 1916. Her husband outlived her eight years.

Baring-Gould is the epitome of the English priest more interested in local antiquities and literature than liturgy. He spent his life collecting folk songs and the fragments of local lore. My source on Baring-Gould requires a double-columned page to list every work. He wrote several novels and two hundred short stories, all now forgotten. One of his earlier productions was a biography of another eccentric, the Reverend Stephen *Hawker of Morwenstowe, about whom I wrote two essays in 2014. Hawker's church in Exeter was on the cliffs overlooking the Bristol Channel. One of the curiosities of Baring-Gould's native Devonshire is the Dartmoor Plain, an uninhabited area larger than a state park. When Nancy & I were in Exeter in 1973, working on the poet Robert *Herrick, we were warned not to explore the Dartmoor Plain on our own because it was largely unsigned; people were known to get lost without communication (this was before the days of I-phones). I thought this was odd, that nothing seemed to have been done to make the area accessible. But we were young, fearless, and drove our rented car about two miles into this eerie and forbidding land. Then the car broke down. We looked to be stranded. Fortunately a family living near the entrance must have spotted us because they went in after us, and took us back to their house, shaken. They gave us tea and biscuits (cookies), called a garage in the city, and drove us back to our B&B. It has been more than forty years; there may be some signs there now.

Baring-Gould and associates began to investigate the area in the 1890s, including archeological excavations, which unearthed evidence of prehistoric dwellings. He published two books on this work, Dartmoor Idylls (1896) and A Book of Dartmoor (1900) and edited several years of annual reports. In addition he collected folklore and songs about Devon, Wales, and the west, working occasionally with the well-known collector, Cecil Sharp (1859-1924). One publication, English Folk Songs for Schools, was in use past 1960. The rest of Baring-Gould's collections are in the Vaughan Williams Memorial Library in the Devon History Center in Exeter.

It should not surprise us that Baring-Gould's lyrics are found in our hymnal, namely "Now the day is over" (#42), "The angel Gabriel from Heaven came (#265), "Singing songs of expectation (#527), and one of the most notorious lyrics in Protestantism, "Onward, Christian soldiers" (#562). The well-known tune for this was composed by Sir Arthur Sullivan (1842-1900), of Gilbert & Sullivan fame, whose lifelong regret was that he was never taken as seriously as he felt he was deserved. (We will get to him one of these days.) In defense of Baring-Gould's almost tasteless lyrics, which no Episcopalian could sing these days without a smile, refers to a point in the Victorian Church when the charge to evangelize and convert the population of the world, especially China, to the message of Christ. It belongs to the expansion of Britain's colonial empire. I cannot think of any recent period in Christian history that could think of itself so militantly, so seriously.

Baring-Gould's most productive period was the 1890s. Many items survived into the twentieth century, though not so well known as the words to these hymns. He was buried next to his wife at the family estate in Devon. --hlf
